

The Protosem Journey Begins: Week 0

The air crackled with excitement on our very first day. We didn't just walk into a standard orientation; we dove headfirst into a series of mind-challenging sessions and interactive plays. The energy was contagious, instantly igniting my eagerness to tackle the tasks that lay ahead.

But enthusiasm needs direction, and that's exactly what the second day provided. We gathered for a comprehensive deep-dive that answered the big question: What exactly is Protosem? As the mentors laid out the roadmap for our next 20 weeks, the scattered puzzle pieces of our upcoming journey began to form a clear, ambitious picture.

[illegible]

We took the 16 Personalities test, which turned out to be a surprisingly fun and fascinating exercise in self-discovery.

I found out that I am an INFJ, also known as the "Advocate." It was a true lightbulb moment. I've always considered myself an introvert, yet I carry this strong, deep-seated desire to help others and make a positive impact on the world. Understanding this dynamic made me realize how these seemingly contrasting traits will actually be a great asset to my team as we collaborate.

This theme of reflection carried over into the fourth day through a creative comic session. We were tasked with finding a comic—and relating to an anime character—that resonated with our lives. I stumbled upon a Zen Pencils comic titled "The Stonecutter." The story struck a deep chord within me. It perfectly mirrored those frustrating moments in my past where I would invest immense time and energy into a goal, only to walk away right before the breakthrough. Reading it felt like a personal call to action—a vivid reminder to stay focused, persevere through the tough challenges, and never give up when the finish line is just out of sight.

Finally, day five brought us back to the professional realm. I updated my LinkedIn profile with the Protosem badge. With a newfound understanding of our personal strengths and a clear vision for the next 20 weeks, we spent the day entirely focused on LinkedIn. We learned how to translate our personalities and ambitions into a strong digital footprint.

As Week 0 came to a close, I realized it wasn't just a kickoff; it was a profound starting point. I walked away knowing exactly what to expect from the program, but more importantly, I walked away knowing a little bit more about who I am.